Evolution is a subset of adaptation. Limited to Biological morphology, it could be convincingly argued that the two words are one and the same. There are many ways in which living organisms adapt to their needs at any given time. Any change made...

Barnosky: One thing they tell us is that as you go through the past 70 million years, there are many times at which we get a changeover from one set of species to a new set of species. Those changeovers are called "faunal turnovers," and the things that contribute to them are both the evolution of new species and the immigration of species from other areas.

The evolution of sexual reproduction describes how sexually reproducing animals, plants, fungi and protists could have evolved from a common ancestor that was a single celled eukaryotic species.

There are a few species which have secondarily lost the ability to reproduce sexually, such as Bdelloidea, and some plants and animals that routinely reproduce asexually (by apomixis and ...

Early Modern Homo sapiens. All people today are classified as Homo sapiens. Our species of humans first began to evolve nearly 200,000 years ago in association with technologies not unlike those of the early Neandertals. It is now clear that early Homo sapiens, or modern humans, did not come after the Neandertals but were their contemporaries.

The main problem here is that Patton omits Darwin's prediction: that there would be many finely graduated intermediates. This is not what current theories predict. That individual kinds of fossils remain recognizably the same throughout the length of their occurrence in the fossil record had been known to paleontologists long before Darwin published his Origin.

So if fire has been used on a widespread basis for cooking since roughly 125,000 years ago, how do we know if that has been enough time for us to have fully adapted to it? To answer that, we have to be able to determine the rate at which the genetic changes constituting evolutionary adaptation take place in organisms as a result of environmental or behavioral change--which in this case means ...
